

Inter-organizational decision-making in Norwegian refugee resettlement

How three agencies shape refugee selection

How do three Norwegian agencies with different mandates collaborate in refugee resettlement?

What happens when their organizational perspective conflict?

- 123 million people displaced in 2024
- 37 million of these are refugees
- Less than 1% of refugees are resettled.

Norwegian resettlement policy contains built-in conflicts that are managed through discretion, not eliminated by policy

Protection vs economic sustainability

Humanitarian care vs. immigration control

Vulnerability vs. integration prospect

SLOs – mediators of conflicting politics and ambiguous policies, balancing conflicting objectives

In resettlement – dynamics manifest most prominently in inter-organizational encounters

Discretion is shaped by institutional factors, which define specific spaces for agency and discretion.

- what decisions can be made
- who is authorized to make them.

Competing interpretations of the same person

The Case: a refugee with a master's degree and strong labor market skills

IMDi sees: an ideal integration candidate who can sustain the resettlement system

UDI finds: Credibility issues in education timeline – potential security risk – REJECTION

Same person, opposite conclusions

Different institutional mandates produce different epistemic perspectives and incompatible knowledges

Conflict resolution through hierarchy not consensus

- UDI has final authority → Protection & security concerns override integration prospects
- Police provide information only → UDI decides if concerns are significant
- Multiple criteria, unclear priority → Resolved through institutional power, not policy clarification

Take aways

Policy

Clarify priorities instead of hiding tensions

Design the role of each agency with conflicts in
